LOVERS

Lova Lova

Lova Lova may resonate with many of us as the sexy gimmick from the rapper Shaggy, but it is also the name of a duo of artists formed by Léa Magnien and Quentin Chantrel. You may have seen their intriguing image that was used to promote the last Festival of Marseille; a mixed couple, curiously dressed, posing on the rocks in front of the harbour of Marseille. One cannot tell at first glance whether the photo is an offbeat fashion image, a disguise, or a ceremonial representation. There are many ambiguities which the young French couple who grew up in Guyana since the age of 5 have had to take onboard with the postcolonial legacy and their minority status. The result of their collaboration is an exciting body of work on identity, gender, and culture that does not hesitate to take their share of "clichés" with a lot of humour, as their self-portraits as sunburned tourists shows.

Behind the apparent frivolity, fundamental questions are asked about the representation of the other.
